

Everybody wants to get into real estate these days.

It's rare for them to build a six-figure business with it though.

I used to be a lifeguard staring at swimming pools all day long for £400 per month.

I'm now running multiple cash-flowing units across the country.

Everything changed when I turned my back on generic real estate.

The turning point was going all in on real estate arbitrage instead.

The reality is that the average person is bound to fail with something like buy-to-let.

I'm talking about putting down a lump sum, settling for a single tenant, and dealing with endless bureaucracy.

This means that you're locked down on every single unit, you miss out on asymmetric rates, and you're constantly being capped out.

It's actually quite realistic for most people to do well with rent-to-rent on the other hand.

I'm talking about paying the landlord their rent, letting guests stay at various intervals, and having the freedom to expand.

The result is that you need a fraction of the budget, you pocket all of the excess transfers, and you stack up units as time goes on.

I'm hosting a free live masterclass where I'll be teaching absolutely everything around this.
